The Temporal Dimension of Discernment. Memory and History

ABSTRACT

History and memory: Over the past half century anthropologists and psychologists, social theorists and philosophers have reflected on the relationship of these paired terms. Often they have drawn attention to an additional element: forgetting. As they note, the construction of history is a selective process. As some facts (or "alternative facts") are instrumentalized, others are forgotten. While some memories are promoted as representative of collective memory, others are repressed. In memorials and memorialization, in celebrations and commemorations, who or what gets remembered? Who or what gets forgotten, whether by inadvertence or by design? Questions such as these have taken on new urgency in recent decades, and not only for the Orthodox. Too often in the past we have allowed old grievances to become markers of identity and turned wounds real or perceived into weapons. Needed now is discernment of ways towards forgiveness and reconciliation.
